

det drejer sig om varer, der er nære substitutter – f. eks. brændsel. Vigtigt er det imidlertid at mærke sig, at prisfastsættelsen fortsat er stærkt centraliseret, og at der ikke som i den tsekkiske reform er nogen mulighed for individuel prisfastsættelse indenfor godkendte rammer.

Reformen forekommer at være af ret traditionel karakter, og det vil næppe være meget forkert at slutte sig til vurderingen i kongresrapporten¹ af den og dermed til en vis grad af hele den økonomiske reform: »It is questionable... whether the new prices will contribute much to improving the choices which enterprise managers, exercising their expanded decisionmaking powers, will make regarding current inputs and outputs and investment. Nor are they likely to enhance the ability of higher administrative authorities to evaluate enterprise performance. Rather, it appears that the reform of industrial prices is not as bold as would be required to carry out successfully the changes in planning, management and incentives which it is supposed to help implement.«
